We anchored for the night off their floating camp and were visited by myriads of mosquitoes. A few miles below the lake let us the last of the great slave crossings. Since the Ajawa invasion the villages on the left bank have been abandoned and the people are living on the right bank. Resting for a few minutes beside the valuable fishery here we [illegible] young [illegible] formed looking man from some sea coast tribe [illegible] great lake have a

the landing place (on our first trip) a middle aged woman of remarkable intelligence and possessing more knowledge of the country than any of the men appeared to have, our first definite information about Lake Nyassa was obtained from her. Seeing us talking with she remarked to our men that she had been to the sea and had there seen white men working as we were doing. She had seen camels also, having probably been among the Arabs. She was the only Manganja woman we ever met who was ashamed of wearing the pelele or lip ring. She returned to her hut, took it out and kept her hand before her lip when conversing with us. All the villagers respected her even the headman took a secondary place beside her. On enquiring for her they told us that she was dead, we found she was dead between us. We landed below at McKenzie's and took observations for longitude to verify those taken two years before. The village is deserted now McKenzie and his people having fled to the other side of the river. A few had come across this morning to work in their old gardens. After completing our work we had breakfast and as the last of the things were carried into the boat a man came running down to the canoe and cried out "The Ajawa!

they've just killed my comrade." He shoved off and in two minutes the advanced guard of the Manyema marauding party were standing with their muskets on the very spot where we had taken breakfast.
They were evidently surprised at seeing us there and halted as did also the main body, perhaps a thousand

Zimiri's people had [deleted] people on our right on a long island on which they had placed their stores of grain to prevent its falling into the hands of the Ajawa. During the monsoon they had moved back again to the mainland and were living in fancied security. On approaching the chief's village what
